Financial barrier - not everyone can afford it

Signal to noise barrier - internet is huge. Hard to find the relevant, effective learning material for you.

created by mentors, for all

Knowledge assets

Publications, books, articles, textbooks, workshops, courses

Sustainable hyper-personalization is not a mentor activity. It should be done by the apprentices. It is a time and effort-expensive activity for a mentor or educator.

The huge context switching cost is modeled as: running from the expert context (from the right) to absorbing their apprentice's context (to the left), to synthesizing the knowledge while in their context, and running back to their expert context.

Especially for someone who desires continuous learning, this is taxing, inefficient, and unsustainable in many situations.

Ownership of your growth data is uncommon in the industry. Growth journals, feedback reports, etc. are owned and maintained by the HR dept. of corporations, rather than personally owned and managed by the growing individual.

Growth data can sometimes get locked in a corporation and then discarded because it doesn't matter to the companies.

Mentors

created by apprentices for apprentices

Knowledge assets

Publications, books, digital content, contextual guides, tutorials, videos, transfer learning from games

Some apprentice desiring to grow faster

Some mentor desiring to instruct, guide, inspire, teach

Mentorship is a time-expensive activity and requires heavy involvement between both parties.

Trust is a challenging resource to discern who to give it to. Apprentices don't know what kinds of mentors are out there, and how they negotiate.

Mentors don't know which apprentices have great character and discipline, to discern who to invest in.

Intellectual property is a concept that young apprentices don't know yet how to protect and leverage, despite their capability to create value.
